This shaded, quiet cemetery immediately appears as very old when visited in person. It is a couple of hundred yards north of the Smith Cemetery (72-2), which is firmly believed to be the burial place of Hughy Smith, the original landowner of the area. Considering the old plantation practice of putting the owner's cemetery within about 150 - 300 yards of the plantation main house, and then placing the supporting slave village and cemetery within about another 300 - 500 yards, the arrangement here certainly supports that this is the Smith Plantation slave cemetery. There are no grave markers at all to be found here, which further supports the conclusion that this is a slave cemetery.

Smith Slave Cemetery (72-1), Redstone Arsenal, Madison County, Alabama, July 2002. (Evidence of old fence in several tree trunks of SW corner)

There was apparently an old fence in the southwest portion of the cemetery, as indicated by remnants of barbed wire embedded in several tree trunks. However, there was no particular patter perceived regarding the route of the old fence, so it is not known whether it was part of a perimeter fence or perhaps an internally separated family plot.

At the base of the oak tree to the right can be seen one of the few fieldstones found in this cemetery. The photos below enlarge on views of that fieldstone, which carries no inscribed information.

With no inscribed tombstones to provide names of those buried here, land records provide the only avenue of further investigation, beyond the oral history reports (if any, for this cemetery) that may have been collected by Beverly Curry. The original land record summary for this area is shown below, as published by Margaret Matthews Cowart in her book OLD LAND RECORDS OF MADISON COUNTY, ALABAMA. Of course, the lines of interest deal with the location of this cemetery, in the northwest corner of the Southeast Quarter of Section 15, Township 15, Range 1 West.

The INDEX TO LANDS reveals that Hughy Smith retained title to the SE/4 of Section 15 until his death, when it passed to his son Stanhope Smith. Stanhope was a physician, who apparently did not want to be a plantation "farmer". He allowed the land to eventually go to auction, and William B. Edwards purchased it in 1867 – after the slaves had been emancipated during the Civil War, which ended in 1865. (See details of the Smith family story and transition of the land ownership in the Summary Report for the Smith Cemetery, 72-2.) The slave count for the Hughy Smith plantation is given below for 1840 and for 1850, just before Hughy passed away:

William B. Edwards gave the "Smith Plantation" to his daughter Lizzie when she married Henry Grantland. Henry and Lizzie had a daughter named Beulah, who married a Rice, and from that marriage was produced Grantland Rice. For those too young to recall, Grantland Rice was the foremost sportscaster and sportswriter in America during the 1930s and 1940s. The annual collegiate championship trophy for many years was known as the known as the Grantland Rice trophy, in his honor.

While the slaves in the little cemetery would not have had any knowledge of the national prominence that would come later to owners of the land that they worked, it was their effort that made the land ultimately productive and supportive of such families. The cemetery remains as a silent witness to the lives of the black families who labored and enabled this area to produce prominent persons who were influential across the entire country in future generations. Today, we can only surmise that black people from the slave populations of the Smith, Austin, and other nearby families are interred here.
